THE PITCHER.

I'd like to be a pitcher, and on the diamond stand, a cap upon my forehead, a ball within my hand. Before applauding thousands I'd throw the curving sphere, and from the eyes of batsmen bring forth the briny tear. I'd make my occupation a thing of pomp and dread. I'd tie myself in bow-knots and stand upon my head; a string of wild contortions would mark my every throw, and all the fans would murmur: "Oh, girls, ain't he a Jo?" And when I'd leave the diamond, on rest or pleasure bent, the kids would trail behind me and worship as they went; and all the sporty grown-ups would say: "He's warm enough!" And fair and cultured ladies would cry: "He is the stuff!" I'd like to be a pitcher while I remain below; by day to gather garlands, by night to count the WALT MASON.
